WHAT'SON. The exhibition Marsden Past has been compiled by Marsden History Group, together with the Workers' Education Authority. Still time to visit valley's past. Historians still debate whether the New Deal succeeded. Those who say it succeeded point out that economic indicators, while they did not return to pre-Depression levels, did bounce back significantly, and also point to the infrastructure created by WPA workers as a long-term benefit. Critics point out that, while unemployment fell after 1933, it remained high. They argue that the New Deal did not provide long-term solutions and only the war ended the Depression. Furthermore, many critics feel the New Deal made changes in the government's role that were not a benefit to the nation. 3 loc.gov/t Encouraging people to work longer and fostering the employability of older workers have become priorities for policymakers. Training specifically designed for older workers might help attain these goals, since it may refresh human capital and reduce the pay-productivity gap.Â Policies aimed at retaining older workers need to define training programs to meet the specific learning needs of older workers. Shown to be effective are learning activities that are self-paced, job-related, and work-integrated. Is training effective for older workers?Â This kind of initiative requires government to create communication and education strategies aimed at informing training firms of what it takes to fully exploit older workers' human resources. Limitations and gaps.
