Attention in Action provides state-of-the-art discussion of the role of attention in action and of action in constraining attention. The research takes an interdisciplinary approach covering experimental studies of attention and action, neuropsychological studies of patients with impaired action and attention, single cell studies of cross-modal links in attention and action, and brain imaging studies on the underlying neural circuitry. The book signals the emergence of a burgeoning area of study in cognitive neuroscience and kindred fields." - David A. Rosenbaum, Pennsylvania State University, USA. Traditionally, the study of attention has tended to emphasize the processes involved in selecting stimuli for action. In contrast, the processes and brain mechanisms involved in selecting the appropriate action to objects, and the interactions between selective perception and action, have been somewhat neglected. Recently, however, this has changed. This change comes partially through the development of new procedures for measuring actions accurately, and for measuring the relations between attention and action (three-dimensional kinematic analysis, saccadic contingent display changes).
