Wexler and Culicover address themselves not to the myriad data on the child's speech at various stages, but to a single, crucial datum: all children succeed at acquiring a grammar for the language of their community, based on the information available in the sentences addressed to them. Xvii, 647 pages : 24 cm. Includes bibliographical references (pages 615-629). Includes indexes. FIRST LANGUAGE ACQUISITION This is the acquisition of the mother tongue. Chronology is important here (see below). The degree of competence acquired may vary from individual to individual and may be checked by later switching to another language. Note that language acquisition is largely independent of intelligence, although individuals can and do differ in their mastery of open classes such as vocabulary.Â This illustrates a principle of early language acquisition: children move from the general to the particular, refining their knowledge of their language as they proceed. Furthermore one can claim that those elements and features which appear earliest are natural and unmarked in a statistical sense across the world's languages.
