I think most Windows developers, me included, have a cargo-cult view of Windows Security. We pick up various tips and half-truths over the years and get around most security issues by a process of trial and error. All too often we simply give our applications elevated permissions simply because that's the only way we can get them to work. I've also gained a real insight into the way logon sessions work and how security tokens attach to them. I had no idea that every Windows resource has an owner and the implications of ownership. The sections on Kerberos, delegation and impersonation were also real eye-openers.
