Major League Losers could hardly arrive at a more important time. With owners seeking new revenues to offset soaring player salaries, Boston, Detroit, Pittsburgh, and San Francisco will all likely see new stadiums built over the next decade. A key rationale for the new facilities: All will have luxury suites that rent for as much as $250,000 a year and provide profits that owners usually do not have to share with the leagues.Â The real answer is for cities and states to better evaluate the costs and revenues that teams bring. Here, Rosentraub shines. He notes that owners--along with the consultants they hire and the politicians they woo--overestimate teams' economic impact, sometimes by as much as tenfold.
