Financial accounting is not a system for the neutral measurement of economic value. Book value and economic value are instead conceptually different, with conservatism resulting from that difference. This inherent conservatism seems to have been overlooked both by the IASB and by its critics. This paper describes the fundamental concept of the reconciliation behind the indirect method of the statement of cash flows. A conceptual framework is presented to demonstrate how accrual- and cash-basis accounting methods relate to each other and to illustrate the concept of reconciling these two accounting methods. The conceptual framework recognizes additional categories of effects defined in Experts define financial accounting as the process of preparing financial statements for a business or enterprise. There are three critical financial statements involved, namely, income statement, balance sheet, and cash flow statements. These are meant to report the current financial standing of the company and to portray how it has been performing over time. As mentioned in the previous paragraphs, the three fundamental financial statements are the balance sheet, income statement, and cash flow statements. All three accounts the same daily transactions in a business but each presents the results or factors quite differently. Income Statement. The income statement shows operational results.
