In this work on the Cape Region of Baja California, Ann Zwinger designates herself as "the desultory wanderer," and her self-avowed desultoriness is responsible for the major strengths and weaknesses of the book. It allows her to investigate a wealth of material, focussing now on geology, now on history, now on a Sally Lightfoot crab. However, in spite of the logical, spatial organization of the chapters, which move from the highest peak of San Lazaro to the underwater landscape off shore, the narrative at times leaves the reader uncomfortably leaping from
