The authors provide a clear chapter-by-chapter assessment of state violence, corruption, state involvement in organised and corporate crime, avoidable "natural" disasters, torture, criminal policing, war crimes and genocide. Penny Green and Tony Ward put forward a powerful argument drawing from a range of disciplines including law, criminology, human rights, international relations and political science. State-corporate crime is thus a significant form of high-level criminality, involving a coincidence of interest and enterprise between two powerful entities typically viewed by criminologists as separate. Over the past decade, a small group of criminologists have converged to develop a methodology to examine this intersection between state crime and corporate crime. State Crime: Governments, Corruption and the Suppression of Human Rights has been added to your Basket. This is an introductory text which defines the field and sets out the parameters of state crime in all its forms: state violence, corruption, transnational crime, state involvement in corporate crime, in avoidable "natural" disasters, torture and illegal punishment, criminal policing, war crimes and genocide. It incorporates a thorough review of the themes, issues, and debates central to the existing literature on state crime, drawn from a range of disciplines, including criminology, human rights, international relations and political science; and develops a theoretical approach to the connection between corruption and the suppression of human rights. The connection between corruption and the suppression of human rights has been recognized by scholars of human rights, state and state-corporate crime, non-governmental organizations, the United Nations as well as various governments. Scrutiny of governmental and/or regime corruption has been a primary focus, in relation to barriers and/or violations of human rights. Additionally, multinational companies' complicity in corruptive policies and practices has raised concerns, in particular in the arms and natural resources sector.
