Hence, multiple staff ministry describes two or more persons forming a ministry team. These may be credentialed and salaried staff, unpaid staff and/or credentialed or un-credentialed lay ministers. A healthy approach to ministry is based on the assumption that all members of the body of Christ are called and gifted to serve and minister; some in pastoral roles, others in areas of program leadership. Working together in multiple staff ministry is complex, often difficult, and sometimes conflicted. Those who have worked in such settings report both very good and very challenging experiences with multiple staff. Reflection can lead to self-doubt about one's own functioning, about one's ability to judge other persons, about one's responsibility for the problem. Tomgeer Abilene Christian University. MULTIPLE STAFF MINISTRIES Kenneth R. Mitchell. Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1988. "Your mission, should you choose to accept it, is to disable the operations of this staff within forth-eight hours." This fanciful and disturbing suggestion is part of an exercise that examines staff weaknesses in Kenneth Mitchell's book, Multiple Staff Ministries. It is the last of sixteen steps in a self-study that lies at the heart of this fascinating work on multiple member church staffs. Kenneth Mitchell begins by acknowledging the difficulties. The church had a reputation of staff tensions, divisions, and in-fighting. The previous twenty years had seen the appearance and disappearance of three strong-willed pastoral leaders. The original, founding pastor had retired, the second pastor had been asked to leave, and the third pastor, caught in the crossfire of controversy surrounding the first two, made the wise choice to move to another church. The details of the battles among the multiple staff are being omitted, You have reached the end of this Article Preview. To continue reading, subscribe to Christianity Today magazine.
